

CREATION IN THOUGHT

A long time ago, there was a single thought within Creation. This thought was not begun out of a desire or need. This thought came about in the simple process that was deemed creative.

The thought was born out of love as well as discipline. The love gave the thought strength as well as the energy that would enhance its very process. The discipline gave the thought direction as well as the energy to create through its very unfoldment.

The creative process, in which the thought was now being born, was one of very simple origin. The creative process did not take its base from various mathematical or scientific structures, nor did it base its very existence upon the formulas within either of those structures. The creative process began through a feeling that blossomed with the love and grew in focus through the discipline. The creative process began to unfold within the very heart of Creation.

Within the heart, were many different avenues of approach that would allow the thought to unfold in harmony and peace. Through the unfoldment in harmony and peace, the thought began to take on a degree of substance and form. With the substance and form, came the need for discipline in which to focus the energy of the thought. The discipline was simply a space of time in which to concentrate upon the thought to the exclusion of all other thoughts. From within the heart, the thought gained a great deal of energy and light from the love and the discipline.

The simple thought gained energy until it began to move past the creative process, through the beginnings of form and substance, and reached a point in which all the energy moved into motion and became Creation in itself.

Creation moved outward into the reality of existence. Creation became solid form with limitations and subject to the reality that it was born into. Creation took hold and began to move outward through physical effort, mental effort, emotional dedication and spiritual discipline. Creation took an outward manifestation of the creative process from within.

This was how the simple thought that began in Creation became a manifested form within the reality of existence. This is how a thought begins within Creation and through love and discipline, becomes manifested as form within the reality of existence. Through the dedication of love and the discipline of focused energy, a thought becomes something more than just a movement within Creation.

Now, when you have a thought move through from Creation, you will understand the steps through which that thought may move in order to become a physical manifestation: You will understand that this is possible without mathematical or scientific measures. Now you will understand that through love and discipline, come the great masterpieces of Creation that have graced the life of mankind for evermore.

S. Fargie 1994